

'United in frustration'

Young climate activists create global Mock COP26 to drive climate action and challenge world leaders to do better

More than 350 delegates from 145 countries unite for two-week virtual climate conference

19 November - 01 December 2020

- Mock COP26 is an online alternative to postponed COP26, organised by students across the globe to demand more action from world leaders on the climate crisis.
- More than 350 young delegates selected from 145 countries, to outline the views of young people from the countries they represent.
- Delegates will produce a collective final statement that will be developed into a formal treaty, which national governments could adopt into law.
- Over 800 young people have applied to attend Mock COP26, with the highest number of applicants from India, Kenya, Nigeria, Pakistan and the Philippines.
- High profile speakers include the UN Envoy on Youth, Jayathma Wickramanayake and the COP26 Champion for UN Climate Talks, Nigel Topping.

Monday 09 November 2020: More than 350 young delegates from across the world will come together in 10 days for a two-week virtual conference to demand more action on climate change and social justice from world leaders. In the month when the now-postponed COP26 was due to take place in Glasgow, student activists are taking the opportunity to show the world what would happen if young people ran COP26.

Mock COP26 is borne of young people's increasing frustration at years of inaction from global leaders on the climate crisis, exacerbated by the postponement of COP26 until November 2021. The virtual alternative to COP26 is being coordinated by a team of 18 student staff and 196 volunteer students from 52 countries, supported by educational charity Students Organising for Sustainability (SOS-UK).

Pauline Owiti, Mock COP26 organiser, Kenya, said: "I believe young people are a major resource for development and key agents for change. The involvement of young people in decision making should be a priority, as we have the power to solve the challenges we face in the world. Yet we are often sidelined. With Mock COP26 we have the opportunity to contribute something meaningful to society and change the perception of youth leadership."

Mock COP26 will equip and empower youth around the world to engage their political leaders on climate targets and will culminate in a powerful statement outlining what leaders should agree to at COP26 - and what young people of the world should do in the absence of sufficient global ambition.

Environmental law charity ClientEarth will support the students throughout the conference, to develop the final statement into a legal treaty which national governments could adopt into law.

Over 800 young people across the globe applied to take part in Mock COP26, with the highest number of applicants coming from India, Kenya, Nigeria, Pakistan and the Philippines. There is consensus amongst young people that voices in the Global South are not being heard, resulting in a determination to ensure that students from the Global South, and marginalised voices, are represented and heard at the conference.

The conference will feature empowering keynotes and panels by global names and youth activists, including the UN Envoy on Youth, Jayathma Wickramanayake and the COP26 Champion for UN Climate Talks, Nigel Topping. The discussions will be framed around five conference themes: climate justice, climate education, health and mental health, green jobs, and carbon reduction targets (NDCs), and the focus will be on speakers from the Global South and marginalised groups.

Jayathma Wickramanayake, UN Envoy on Youth said: "I am delighted to see so many young climate leaders from around the world coming together to organise Mock COP26, and making a commitment to continue amplifying marginalised voices within the climate movement. Young people worldwide – and particularly those in the developing world – are already disproportionately experiencing the worst impacts of climate change. They will also be the ones facing the long-term consequences of climate decisions made by world leaders today.

"I join them in asking decision-makers everywhere to take the climate crisis seriously and commit to meaningful action on climate change so that we can ensure a healthy and sustainable planet for generations to come."

Each country's delegation will have an opportunity to make a high-level statement outlining the views of young people from the countries they represent, with more time allocated to countries from the Global South, and those facing the most severe impact from our changing climate.

The conference will culminate in a powerful final statement to world leaders from the youth of the world, raising ambition for COP26. Delegates will then be supported and mentored to engage and lobby their domestic politicians in the run up to COP26.
